

The FCC is headed in the wrong direction in considering easing restrictions on the number of broadcast stations a single entity may own. And the decision scheduled for Monday is being taken without due consideration of public opinion. (The fact that I had to wait until after midnight to access this website tells me that it has been overwhelmed with similar commentary.) The viability of the Broadcast industry should not be the prime concern of the FCC. That prime concern should be the diversity of information available to the general public. I would urge that no steps be taken that would concentrate the available airwaves into the hands of fewer companies.
